

hattie's history... established in 1789 hattersley is the oldest firm of loom makers in the world

After serving his apprenticeship in 1784 at Kirkstall Forge, Richard Hattersley set up his own business at Stubbings Mill, Aireworth, manufacturing nuts and bolts. The business expanded and diversified into manufacturing spindles and rollers, prompting a move in 1800 to more spacious premises at South Street, Keighley. Richard's son George came into the business and took over its running. In 1834 he was asked to build a power loom for weaving worsted cloth. Despite the general view at the time that good worsted could only be produced on hand looms George proved them wrong as he completed the world's first worsted power loom.

hattersley and the luddites

The original Hattersley worsted power loom met its' end at Nab Wood, near Shipley, en route to the first customer in Bradford where it was smashed by a group of "Luddites" - revolutionary hand loom weavers - fearful of their future livelihood. A woodcut print of the scene appeared in The London Times on 16th August 1862 (inset). Not to be deterred by this temporary setback, Hattersley soon manufactured a replacement machine and successfully delivered it to their customer. It was not long before the revolutionary worsted power loom went into full time production, ironically creating jobs for many of the former hand loom weavers who had tried so hard to stop it.

the hattersley dobby

In 1867 Hattersley made a major breakthrough for the textile industry by inventing the "Dobby", a mechanical head lifting device which allowed weaving of much more intricate patterns on any looms to which it was fitted.

1921 standard loom

Was designed and built by the company in Keighley, and was to sell in its' thousands, bringing considerable financial success. In the 1930's progress continued when rayon (man made silk) was invented and the Hattersley silk loom went into full scale production for weaving rayon fabrics. At this time looms were exported all over the world.

narrow fabric looms

In 1908 Hattersley developed the world's first narrow fabric loom, which was not taken seriously by the textile industry, so Hattersley's bought Cabbage Mills in Keighley, filled it with their own machines and starting the production of tapes, webbings and wicks. The venture was an unqualified success, with the factory working around the clock during the First World War to produce tapes, metal ribbons and webbings for the services. This "narrow fabrics" part of the business was eventually relocated to the larger premises of Greengate Shed in Keighley, where it continues to operate as Hattersley Aladdin Ltd to this day.

The world famous Hattersley pedal powered "Domestic Loom" was manufactured until 1981 - having being developed for markets overseas in the British Empire. Ironically it was Scotland's Harris Tweed Industry which adopted it in the greatest numbers. The loom combined all the know-how of 19th century loom engineering into a small, compact human powered format. The first thirty Hattersley's were sent to the Outer Hebrides in 1919 and this type of loom was the most commonly used loom in the islands and is still in use
